A Journey Through Frames and Feelings

Arun JS

Visual Storyteller | Communication for Change

Arun believes that communication is one of the most powerful tools for social change. Having spent years working at the grassroots level with NGOs, he has seen how stories, visuals, and ideas can move people and create impact.

His journey into media began with mobile photography - capturing travel moments and everyday life. What started as a casual curiosity soon evolved into a deep interest in street and documentary photography. Through his lens, Arun explores the emotions, struggles, and silent stories of ordinary people, often turning fleeting moments into powerful narratives.

He works with a basic camera, believing that authenticity and empathy matter more than technical perfection. For Arun, photography is not just about images - it's about preserving lived experiences and connecting people through shared human stories. Outside his creative work, Arun draws inspiration from cinema, writing, travel, and cars. He's often found at a teashop, sipping chai and discussing films and life with friends - always searching for new ideas, new roads, and the next story to tell.

Man & Machine

Man and Machine reflects the unseen struggle that continues in a world driven by modern technology. Amidst automation and progress, there are still hands that pull, lift, and endure — carrying the burden of motion that machines were meant to ease. Each frame captures the quiet tension between human effort and mechanical power — a reminder that even in an age of innovation, labour remains deeply human.

The Shades

Shades is an exploration of the human face as a living landscape — where emotion, time, and experience leave their quiet marks. Each portrait captures a fragment of truth: a fleeting glance, a tired smile, the calm between chaos. These faces are stories of survival and softness, strength and silence.

In a world that often moves too fast to notice, these images invite us to pause — to look closer at the shades that define us. Light and shadow reveal not just how we appear, but who we are becoming.

Among the hills of Odisha, I met three souls whose silence said more than words could — strength shaped by simplicity, beauty born from belonging.

The Unknown

Toki Mora

Toki Mora” is a festival held in southern Odisha. Mora means to kill and Toki means girl. I recently attended the Toki Mora in Kalahandi District's BejiGuda. There are many stories behind this festival, and I heard a few that convinced me to write this one. It first occurs when a problem, such as a lack of rain or an epidemic, arrives in the village. So, at that time, every villager came to one village to find a girl to kill (human sacrifice) to solve their problems. It's only recently that it's become fashionable to slaughter goats and doves.

Another, The family murdered a girl because she was in love and wanted to elope with her partner. Following that, the villagers decided that if they loved each other, they could come in front of the public and say it during festival time, and if their parents did not agree, the villagers would support them and they could be together. (But I don't think this is happening right now; I haven't found any) This is all I've heard; I'm not sure if there's any truth to it and what to believe.

From Seed to Harvest

Where patience meets purpose - the rhythm of hands, soil, and seasons.

This series captures the quiet poetry of agriculture — from the first seed sown to the final harvest. Through each frame, Arun documents the unseen labor, resilience, and harmony between humans and the earth. It's not just the story of crops growing, but of people nurturing life itself. Every stage reflects a deep connection between hope, effort, and the cycles of nature — a timeless reminder that food is not a product of machines, but of hands that care.

The Yellow

The yellow taxis of Kolkata - still moving through time,
carrying stories in the rhythm of old streets.

The GODS

The GODs is a search for divinity in the fragments of everyday life. In Kolkata's corners, abandoned idols rest beside the remains of faith - while on nearby stages, actors wear crowns of divinity for an audience that believes for a moment. These images question what remains sacred when gods can be both discarded and performed.

Are the gods still among us, or are they reflections of our own longing to be seen, remembered, and revered?

Every photograph in this magazine is just a glimpse of countless untold moments I've witnessed and captured. There are still many more stories waiting behind the lens - stories of people, places, and emotions that continue to move me. This collection isn't the end, just a pause in a much longer journey.

If any image here makes you feel something or sparks a thought, let's talk - because every conversation can become a new story.
